Pba card meaning

Governor Phil Murphy signed a bill Friday prohibiting people who are not police officers from carrying badges in the New Jersey. A law was passed in response to a highly publicized incident in which former Port Authority Commissioner Caren Turner showed a badge issued to her and other officials during a traffic stop involving her daughter in Tenafly. Turner can be seen in the dashcam video scolding police officers for the stop. While Turner's actions were controversial, News 12 New Jersey's Brian Donohue wonders if they weren't much different from an ancient New Jersey tradition -- flashing a PBA card when one is pulled over by police. PBA cards are typically given to friends and family of police officers or people who have donated money to police-related charities. RELATED: New video shows former Port Authority official inside Tenafly police headquarters RELATED: Former port authority commissioner caught swearing at policeman Many New Jerseyans would say that using a PBA card during a road arrest serves as a kind of free prison card. But there's some mystery surrounding the cards. The New Jersey Police Benevolent Association did not return Donohue's calls when it tried to find out more about the cards. Arie Harel was offered to them many times when she lived in New York. Now he's an EMT in Florida and says he doesn't see them where he lives now. I think it's a little crooked. I think it's the best way. You can sleep well at night, he says. Donohue says a PBA card features a unique litmus test in New Jersey for our consciousness. We all have to decide if you're offered a PBA card, do you accept? If you have one and I pull over, will you flash it? He says he had one for a while and felt so shabby that he threw it away. The new law banning badges for non-police officers applies to NJ Transit, municipalities and counties, as well as the Port Authority. PBA stands for Police Benevolent Association and almost all police officers in the United States are members. The friends and family of police officers sometimes receive a pba courtesy card. A PBA card usually printed on it. The bearer of this board is a supporter of the PBA and you should try to extend every possible courtesy. A driver who is lucky enough to have a labia, when stopped for a traffic stop, provides the PBA card along with his driver's license and registration to the officer. If one is lucky, the PBA card could convince the officer to leave the driver without a ticket. But don't Contrary to popular belief, the date on the PBA card is not really that significant. What matters most is whether the officer leading the traffic stop knows the officer whose name is on the card (i.e. the officer who issued the card). In general, if the officer who pulled over the he heard about the officer on paper (and the driver is polite and respectful), the driver has a good chance of not getting a ticket. Sometimes the officer pulls out a warning or just says: Ok. Drive safely and have a good day. Not all PBA cards are treated in the same way Many do not realize this, but not all PBA cards are treated in the same way. If the card a driver receives is a general PBA card that does not contain an officer's name or badge number, they may not get it out of a ticket. However, if the officer is very nice, he could ask the driver from which officer he issued the card, the jurisdiction from which he comes and how the driver knows it. If the driver politely and cordially answers all these questions, then he can help get out of the ticket. Regardless of whether or not the PBA card has the officer's name, the closer the relationship between the driver and the card officer, the greater the chance that you will avoid a ticket. Similarly, the better known is an officer among others on strength, the better the chances of getting out of a ticket. The best type of PBA card you can have is the one that contains the name and number of badges of an officer who is well respected throughout the state. If an officer knows that a driver has a connection to a well-regarded officer, that driver can usually avoid receiving a traffic ticket. PBA cards are not a guarantee There are several myths out there on PBA cards. Many people think that a PBA card is like a free prison card. That is simply not the case. Having a PBA card can be like gambling. Many variables come into the fact that it can help someone or not and there is no guarantee that it will help. Remember, attitude matters. If a driver is arrogant or rude, this is a safe way to get a ticket (regardless of whose name appears on the PBA card). In addition, drivers sometimes think that a PBA card will last forever. In many cases, the officer who pulls over the driver will return it, but that's not always the case. Many drivers reported traffic stops where he got out of a ticket, but the PBA card was taken from them! Ultimately, there is no formal system for what to do when a driver hands an officer a PBA card. However, one thing is certain: without a close bond with an officer on force, a PBA card will not be too useful. Isn't it ethical or illegal to use a PBA card to get out of a ticket? Drivers should be very careful when it comes to using PBA cards. Trying to influence an officer (even if the driver does not offer a bribe) can be illegal or at least misunderstood by the officer. If a driver rubs the officer the wrong way, he can use his discretion to harder. This could mean additional tickets or, in the event of a minor offence, an arrest instead of a simple appearance card with a court date. Police officers have a lot of discretion. If they see someone speeding up and not signaling before changing lanes and not wearing a belt, may issue a ticket for all of the above, some of the above, or none of the above. Remember, showing a police officer a PBA card per se is not illegal per se because if he considers it and decides to be more lenient, that's at his discretion. However, making a statement as an Agent, can you please let me go? or Can you please give me a break? in conjunction with the delivery of the card can be interpreted as an attempt to improperly influence the officer. Traffic stops and non-police badges In 2018, there was a scandal involving a Port Authority chief flashing a badge at New Jersey officers in an attempt to prevent them from seizing a vehicle. While the port authority has uniform law enforcement officers, the commissioner was an elected official and not an officer. As a result, New Jersey has passed a law making it illegal for non-law enforcement officers (LEOs) to receive or use such badges. Even without a formal law banning non-LEO badges, it is against the law that anyone who acts as a policeman without having law enforcement authority. Therefore, showing a non-LEO badge in the hope of getting out of a ticket can simply result in your own arrest. Adam Rosenblum interviewed by Vice News on PBA cards What should I do if my PBA card didn't work? As mentioned, sometimes a person can show a PBA card and still get a ticket. Frances Micklow/The Star-Ledger PBA cards for perspectives shot in Newark. He tries to get police officers and pba card union representatives to talk, and they get inflamed faster than a criminal suspect who wants his lawyer. They're closely guarded secrets, those get-out-of-a-jam-free cards that well-connected drivers carry in their wallets, waiting for the right time to give birth to them — which is usually when red lights flash in their rear-view mirrors as they head to their children's football matches. Look, nothing's as good to get around the law as a stash of 120-mile-per-hour state soldiers, but the cards have been with the police for a long time. I go back 40 years and they've been around as far back as I can remember, said Wayne Fisher, director of the Police Institute at Rutgers University. I'm sure they go much further. For about 20 years, I had a silver life PBA card and never used it. I was awarded -- an honour to at a dinner of the Benevolent Association of Cops - because in the late 1980s and early 1990s, every year I donated money for bulletproof vests for beginner cops. At least half a dozen times since (ok, plus a dozen), I've been stopped for speeding tickets or a warning. Once, when I tried to beat a ticket in court, a state trooper testified that he wasn't sure if, when my car passed, he had felt a backfire or a sonic boom. Putting aside if the cards are ethical, that is, should the cops' family and friends get a pass to the motor vehicle room? — I have always wondered: do these things really work? So, I pressed some police officers I know: Didn't I? Really? The answer: Click. I called the patrol boats (click). Detective (click). Sergeants (click). Lieutenants (click). Captains (click). Deputy Chiefs (click). Police chiefs (click). I tried to get comments from state PBA President Anthony Wieners (crickets). It's a sensitive subject. Some cops took my call -- then took the Fifth. No one wants to be on the record on this, an officer said. People read this, and they get angry and start yelling about special privileges. It's not good publicity. In the end, three active police officers and a former police chief provided the lowdown in exchange for anonymity. The bottom line: I should have worn that silver card around my neck, for Pete's sake. Apparently, the silver card can be a silver bullet. It's the highest PBA honor paid to an average citizen, and most cops would probably honor him. The card would have saved me hundreds of fines and insurance supplements if I had the inclination to play it. But this is a shiny, engraved piece of ceremonially awarded precious metal in front of hundreds of cops and spouses. (They also come in gold - for the police and family members.) What about that piece of cardboard (or plastic), signed by a local cop, in your wallet? Here's how it works: In most cities, each PBA member gets 10 cards to sign and distribute. When stopped for a minor motor vehicle offense, the cardholder has the option to show it to an officer, who then decides whether to honor him. There are several factors to be found in that decision: • The city that issued the card nearby? (A Bloomfield cop may not honor an Egg Harbor Township card.) • Is there a feud between the department that issued your card and the one that stands for ticket?• Is the cop who pulled you up angry that his cards weren't honored in other cities?• And, the officer who signed your card now goes out with the cop's ex-wife who's going to ticket? In the end, the consensus seems to be that courtesy cards still help, but they are not as effective as they were years ago. They worked much harder than they do now, a veteran officer said. The youngest cops these days don't honor anything. They're so regimented. They see everything in black and white. Unfortunately, there is not so much camaraderie in the departments these days. If someone showed me a card I probably wouldn't write a note if it wasn't a bad offense, he added. I'd take the card and call the officer (who released it) and tell them what happened. They'd know I honored the ticket, but I took it away. I would have let him know that the person had used his tribute. Unanimously, cops said the card won't let a driver out a serious crime – drink-driving, for example. Acceleration? Probably, unless the driver overtakes a playground or drives too fast. Texting or chatting on a cell phone? It's 50-50. Roll through a stop signal? Maybe. Pass a school bus? Ah, no. Another factor working against cardholders: There are dozens of flavors around — issued by local PBA, fraternal order of police, New Jersey State Association of Chiefs of Police, Italian American Police Society of New Jersey, county sheriff's departments... And so on. Some cards are fake, some can be purchased on eBay. Thus, PBA members are more likely to honor a PBA card; FOP cops reward FOP cards better. Another complication: Police car cameras now record when cops let citizens slip. It might come back to haunt them, so they might be less likely to look the other way. PBA (or FOP) cards are not the only alleged magic wands. Law enforcement license plates - as the LE indicates - purchased through the state are not likely to help, even if the license plate money goes toward a good cause - children's scholarships of fallen officers. The money for PBA and FOP license plates goes to the state. Police union shields, usually displayed in the rear window of the vehicle, are effective because they are given to the most immediate family members. Every cop takes three. Some, however, do not use them. They can make you a target, an officer said. A drunk man stumbles from a bar, sees the shield and is angry because he took a note last week. So, it destroys the windshield. Sometimes, the culprits break a window and crawl the shield to sell or use it. You can buy almost anything on eBay, and that includes police courtesy cards and more. For this piece, I bought a carte blanche for maplewood police family members for $65. Maplewood Police brass refused to comment on its authenticity. The seller also offered business cards from prosecutors in the state attorney general's office and selected New Jersey mayors. Items are promoted as collectibles, but the implication is clear: they can help you beat a rap. Joseph Buttich, who worked in the New Jersey Office of Homeland Security and Preparedness, was amused to learn that his old business card was being mowed down. What's my title on paper? Buttich asked. State investigator at the state attorney general's office, he was told. A hundred years ago, he said. Fisher believes most of these items don't carry any juice. But what if I sit down? If you have a legitimate card from a legitimate police organization, forward and pull her out, said Fisher. You'd be foolish not to try. Try. But be prepared to pay the fine. Fine.
